Joan Gross has been a volunteer Support Group Leader for almost 10 years. And, at 93, she is stepping down as Leader to place her focus on other passion projects. We sat down with Joan to talk about her life as a dancer, student, teacher, social worker, psychoanalyst, and support group leader.

“I started my career as a dancer. I obtained a master’s degree in dance from Mills College in California and moved to New York to perform. I loved performing – I did the Perry Como Show, City Center, and plenty of Summer Stock. But after 10 years in the business, I was ready to try something new. And I decided that I was a good fit for social work.”

“When I arrived at NYU, I was so interested in this new career that I took it further than I expected and became a clinical social worker. From there, I received my Certificate in Psychoanalysis, and I’ve been a practicing psychoanalyst ever since!

What resonates for me most, as a Support Group Leader, is the interaction between the members of the group. I find it fascinating. They play off each other and it’s like watching a ball bounce around the room. It’s emotional and joyful. And it’s engrossing to watch the group’s involvement with one another.

I remember one incredible moment when a member was so upset about a sibling’s behavior that he suddenly stood up and tore at his hair. The group responded with compassion and humor, which immediately diffused the tension. And the group member’s moment of desperation quickly dissipated in the presence of such support and validation. Remarkable.

My job as a support group leader is to provide a forum in which everyone can participate, speak, and respond. And to make sure everyone feels like they are part of the group. I think my training as a performer and improviser has really helped me facilitate this group. I’ve been more expressive and empathetic. And – like any good cast member – I have great appreciation for everything that happens among the members in the group.

At this age, however, it’s time for me to streamline things. I will always love the group members, but I look forward to focusing on other things, like my continuing education classes, and training students in China (via zoom!) about psychoanalysis. These things keep my brain active!

After all my years as a support group leader, I would offer this advice to caregivers: Don’t lose yourself in the caregiving. Always remember that your own life matters, too!”

A few weeks ago, the world learned the sad news about Bruce Willis being diagnosed with Frontotemporal dementia. We surmise that it was not an easy decision for the family to share this vulnerable information. We salute the family, and especially Bruce Willis, for allowing his diagnosis to be made public. Raising awareness about this illness is still incredibly important for encouraging people to get early diagnoses and to find support, and to increase research.

The media has covered a number of new developments concerning dementia drug treatments. While treatments are paramount, we believe cognitive interventions are also influential in maintaining stability.

Organizations like Caringkind need to work side by side with individuals in early-stage dementia to provide programs that stimulate the brain. We strive to develop new cognitive programs that benefit people living with dementia and related disorders. CaringKind’s partnership can help people express their wants and needs and allow them to live the best version of their lives.

We are also committed to creating social work services that lend support to families and caregivers during all stages of this very long and hard journey. We offer our programs and seminars in person and online, in multiple languages.

Please visit our website for CaringKind’s expanded early-stage services and learn how you can get involved.

Lastly, our organization is grateful to our many wonderful volunteers who help shape and change the lives of people with dementia and their caregivers. If you’d like to be part of this movement at CaringKind, please call us and get involved! We need you all because we want to serve you all!

Imagine this: Your friend’s birthday is coming up and you have no idea what to give her. Would you just buy something and hope for the best? Or would you simply ask her what she wanted and needed? You’d probably just ask! You would involve her in the gift-buying process so that you could guarantee the gift was meaningful and desirable. Sounds obvious, right?

When it comes to dementia care services and research however, it hasn’t always been so obvious to involve people with dementia and their care partners in the development of programs and research designed to benefit them.

Well, CaringKind wants to help change all that. With funds from a $100,000 grant from the AARP, CaringKind is developing a new pilot program called “Make It Matter.” This new education program – for people in the early stage of dementia and their care partners – seeks to prepare them for engagement opportunities in the realms of research, advocacy, focus groups, and more. Graduates of the program will be primed to have a seat at the table in government agencies, nonprofits, academic institutions, and health care companies that need stakeholders with lived dementia experience.

After the training is completed, participants will be able to:

• Describe several types of stakeholder opportunities.
• Define their own priorities for engagement.
• Choose what kind of stakeholder roles would best suit them.
• Identify ways to adapt to the opportunity given their changing cognitive and physical abilities.
• Prepare themselves as an “optimized” stakeholder.

The training itself has both short-term and long-term goals.

In the short term, participants will experience increased hope, resilience and knowledge about, and interest in, stakeholder engagement activities.

In the long term, the program will help strengthen the programs of other institutions by providing those institutions feedback from people with lived experience in Alzheimer’s and dementia.

We hope both short-term and long-term goals will help participants gain some sense of ways to make a difference; to make it theirs their Alzheimer’s or dementia — matter.

We look forward to sharing the results of this pilot program with you in the Fall newsletter. Stay tuned!
Rui Huang, Dementia Care Specialist

Rui Huang has finished her BA in Korean Language & Literature in China and her MA in Linguistics at the City University of New York. She worked for several years at a domestic violence hotline, providing emotional support and crisis intervention services in English, Chinese, and Korean. Rui also teaches Chinese and Korean language at LaGuardia Community College as an adjunct lecturer.

In her leisure time, she is a big fan of Korean movie and music. “Bong Joon-ho, BTS, Blackpink ... you can always find something in different cultures that is good for your mental and physical health!”

Andrea Tallent Spivak, VP of Strategic Alliance

Andrea Tallent Spivak brings over 20 years experience in business development, marketing, and strategic partnerships with clients in real estate operations, media and fashion. She has a BA in Business Administration from Furman University and has grown and managed multi-million dollar accounts for clients nationwide. Through volunteering, she co-founded Caring to Remember, an annual real estate-focused benefit that has raised over $1 million for Alzheimer’s and dementia.

Andrea resides in Westchester County with her family and new puppy, Jax. She is passionate about her community, traveling and experiencing various cultures, music, the arts, and poetry. “Each one of us can make a difference. Together we make change.”

CaringKind In The News

CaringKind's CEO was included in the 2023 Health Care Power 100

When Eleonora Tornatore-Mikesh trained as an aging and dementia specialist at the start of her career, she didn’t know she would be back, nearly 25 years later, to head the same organization.

Prior to her return, Tornatore-Mikesh implemented statewide dementia training in over 140 facilities as CEO of the Alzheimer’s Association Connecticut chapter and is working toward reducing the disease's stigma. She’s also currently working with development initiative Latina Empire to help educate Hispanic families whose loved ones are more likely to get Alzheimer’s disease.

Alan Patricof featured on Fox Business News in support of CaringKind

Alan: “I joined Jackie DeAngelis on Fox Business Network to discuss my support for CaringKind, The Heart of Alzheimer’s Caregiving. During my wife Susan’s 12-year battle with Alzheimer’s, we leaned on CaringKind to provide our family with top-notch care, support, and resources. Last month, I ran the New York City marathon on behalf of CaringKind and raised over $525,000 to support the organization. I’m immensely grateful for their work and look forward to continuing my support in the future.”
